SCHOOL REPORT.

Your school board herewith present their annual report of the schools in this town, and they can honestly speak of progress and achievement. The formative influences which surround a child are many and various. His mind is first put under the guidance and training of parents, but it is very early committed to the care of the teacher in the public school. In many cases the early development is very small indeed, so that when he enters the school the teacher is obliged to begin with the rudiments of knowledge, and lead him forward step by step. This is not always an easy task. It takes time to find out his real capabilities and tastes. It is not true that one child can do just what another one can; and it is not wise to follow the same method with all children in respect to instruction or discipline. As there is a difference in natural gifts, so there should be a difference in training and treatment.

Educators agree in most points, but differ widely in the application of theories, and in the use of methods. The chief thing we wish to emphasize here is this: Since the end sought for is excellence, the way to achieve it should be wisely chosen and skillfully used; else the method will mar the work and defeat the end.

While we magnify the good which our schools can do and are doing, we are by no means insensible to the fact that they are not perfect, nor the teachers infallible, but they accomplish much, and are leading the way to better results in the future. As an agency for intellectual growth, they are of the utmost importance, and they are so vitally connected with the highest welfare of the people, that no one can justly ignore their influence or undervalue the good they do. They are deserving support and careful guardianship, and to render them most effective and useful there is need of union of effort among citizens, parents, teachers and the committee.

We think such union already exists in a measure, and we trust it will become more harmonious as the years go by.

The question then arises are we individually doing all that we can to secure that harmony of action that will give the greatest benefit to scholars under our care. Do not too many parents feel that when their children are attending school that they are free from all responsibility, that the burden is upon the teacher. Do not scholars lean too heavily upon their teachers and wrongfully accuse teachers with neglect and inattention when the real fault is with themselves, arising from a want of ambition and a determination to solve the many difficult questions that arise from day to day in the school room without troubling the teacher by asking many unimportant questions, which they can by studying, find out themselves. We all like gold but dread the digging, so we all would like a good education but dread the labor necessary to secure it. Learning unlike gold cannot be obtained by purchase. It can only be secured by individual effort. Teachers are only help ; the labor is with the scholars.
